The MAPC Arts and Planning Toolkit is a new resource for planners and other government staff who are interested in innovating their civic practices through projects and partnerships that engage arts, culture, and the creative community. Originally designed for planners based in Massachusetts, the website is free and available to all and features case studies and resources from around the country. The Toolkit is ongoing project and we are always looking for new resources and case studies to include. To suggest additions, email Jenn at jerickson@mapc.org.

American Planning Association Arts and Planning Interest Group (APIG)

<https://www.planning.org/divisions/groups/arts/>

The Arts and Planning Interest Group (APIG) is a collaborative space for planners and artists who believe that arts and culture is an essential element of what makes places and communities healthy, connected, and vibrant. APIG provides a forum for identifying, developing, and refining policy and planning tools that promote the integration of arts and culture into community development and planning. This includes exploration of topics like creative placemaking, cultural planning, public art planning, cultural economic development, and zoning and permitting pertaining to arts uses and facilities. APIG currently operates as an online discussion group and convenes annually at the American Planning Association National Conference.

APIG is free to join. Take the new members survey: <http://bit.ly/artsandplanningsurvey>.
